Who is the inventor of android os

Android os inventor. Who is the owner of android os. Who is the owner of android. Who is the inventor of android phone. Who is the inventor of android.

David Imels / Android Authority If you think who owns Android, it is tempting to point to Google and stick to it. However, it's not that easy. Although Google's basic level owns Android, several companies are responsible for the operating system - no one completely defines the operating system on each phone. Who really owns Android? If you just want to know who the Android spiritual owner is, it's no secret: it's Google. The company purchased Android, Inc. in 2005 and helped develop the operating system before the first Android phone T-Mobile G1 was released in 2008. Google is the main operating system developer and works on the main patented elements such as Google Play Services. And official apps like Gmail. When purchasing a Pixel phone, you will discover that Google owns almost the entire Android operating system without hardware drivers. Google is also responsible for the main releases of the Android Open Source Project (AOSP). Although other parties are free to modify or add AOSP source code at will, they do not generate reference points. Unlike decentralized Linux, Google ultimately controls the Android operating system, even if it does not own all parts of the code. Who else has participation in the Android operating system? After Google releases the AOSP version, the ownership becomes more complex. The operating system on many Android devices is essentially owned by Google, but it is often the result of careful customization of the manufacturers. A good example is Samsung One UI - it can be based on Android, but its design, interface and features are mostly from Samsung. There are also Android versions that only have a small connection to Google. For example, Amazon Fire OS is a fork -like version that does not use any Google components that are not free and are actually responsible for Amazon. Chinese vendors like Huawei who can't use Google patented apps in their home country very often develop custom versions of Android, There is relatively little.

Google doesn't leave it completely out of the question.

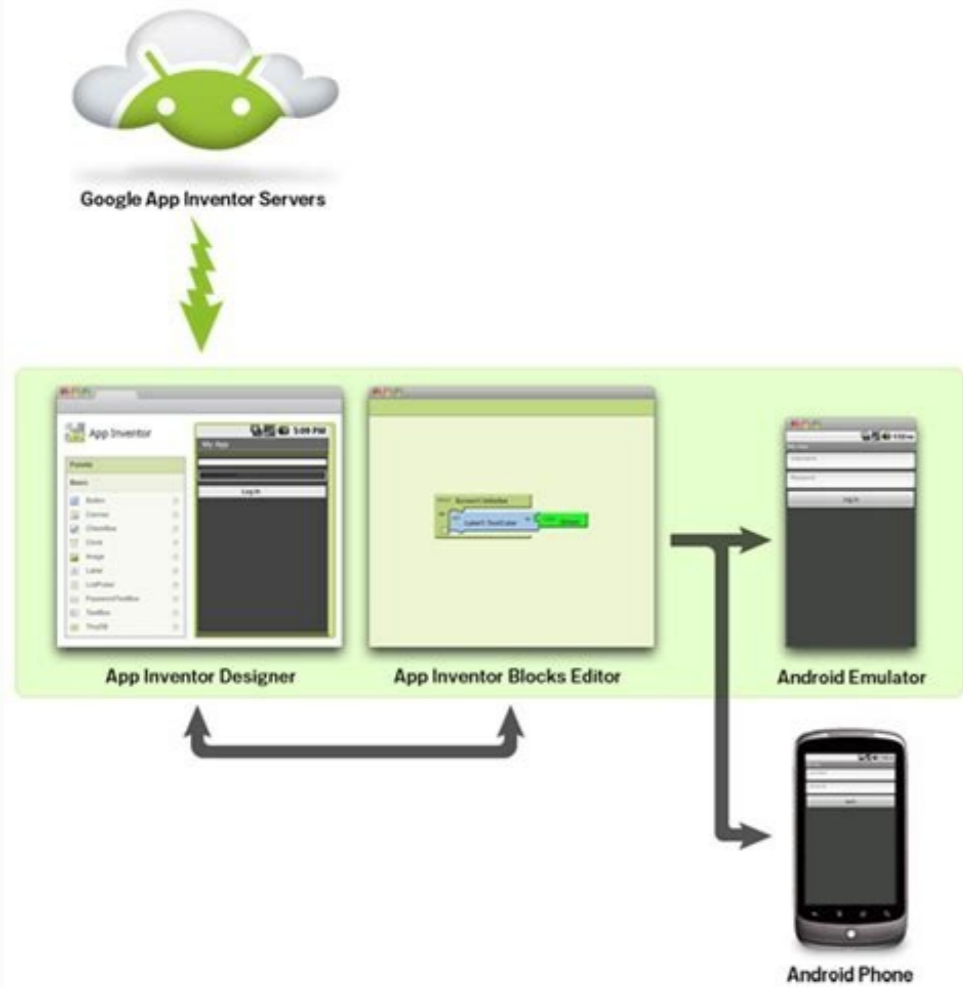

Companies like Amazon and Huawei often base their operating system permissions on Google updates. However, Google's responsibility for these platforms is monitored. Therefore, the question of who owns Android is dictated by the WHO operating system.
